My practice explores how time becomes visible through drawing, photography, and writing. I approach marks as temporal traces: gestures repeated, surfaces eroded, lines accumulated. Writing functions both as language and as a physical act — a movement that extends time and leaves residue.

I am drawn to places of transit — walls, streets, floors — where scratches, stains, and abandoned objects form involuntary archives of human presence. Through drawing and photography, I isolate and reinterpret these fragments.

Repetition is central to my process. By redrawing and rewriting, I test how memory both preserves and distorts experience. My work inhabits the space between seeing and reading, where image and text contaminate one another and meaning remains unstable.

Rather than narrating fixed stories, I construct situations that invite slow attention to what persists, fades, and transforms.
